

Considering Joomla?

Last Updated Friday, 13 June 2008

You are about to get a website built for your business. Having found a good web design house, like where you're at now reading this, you are looking forward to seeing the results of their creative efforts. So far so good.

Once the website is setup, and the customers start rolling in, you will want to make ongoing changes. These could be very small, such as changing a phone number, or adding a news item. New products, or shifts in business direction, will necessitate larger updates to the site. Chances are, though, you will still be happy with the design, and it's just the text that needs to be changed.

While vDomainHosting did a great job, you don't want to have to go back to them for every change. A hundred small changes in a year will leave you both frustrated, and is not economic for either party.

This is where a content management system (CMS) such as Joomla comes in. Sitting behind the scenes, it gives you the ability to maintain your own site.

No website larger than a few pages should be without a Joomla CMS to manage it. Ask today for your 'test drive' of this technology.
